	Hannah Turner has always lived in the historic and beautiful seaside resort of Sand Dollar Cove. Now grieving the loss of her father, Hannah finds comfort in the places that remind her of him, including one of the resort's oldest cottages. Heartbroken that it's due to be knocked down—taking her memories with it—Hannah's heart leaps when she finds old postcards concealed within. Reading "I still believe in our happily ever after" on one of the cards, Hannah feels a pang for the happy ending her father never had. She can't bear someone else's precious memories being destroyed, so she traces the postcards' owner to New York and sends them off—inspired by her discovery to finally seize the day. After watching Guy—the resort's handsome new trainer—charming their older guests, Hannah's new attitude pushes her to give dating a chance for once. Hannah can't resist gazing into Guy's blue eyes as she shows him the delights of the cove. But just as she's about to let him into her heart, she is stunned to find one of the postcards in Guy's bag. Is Guy somehow connected to them? Is this why he came to town in the first place? Hannah is devastated that Guy is hiding something, but can she keep her heart open to love? And when the postcards reveal a surprising link between Hannah and Guy's pasts, will the truth bind them together or tear them apart for good?
